

USAF FINDS RELIEF FROM BIRD DROPPINGS

Bird control of pigeons at the hangar was needed to stop bird droppings on all of the planes, equipment and tools. When birds stay overnight, it's a mess the next morning. Not a good way to start the day☺

Strategically placing one system toward the front half of the hangar creates a "barrier or buffer zone" for birds. Birds don't like grape juice vapor and will go away after a few months. It's invisible, and serves itself by automatic timing and vaporizing the atmosphere. It's self contained and easy to set in place. Just plug and play.

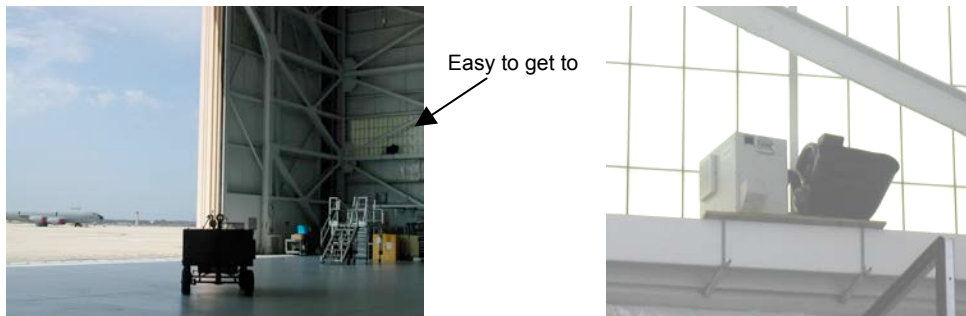

Large hangars will need only one, 1 horsepower fan called the Hurricane II sitting beside the BirdBuffer Q2 to do this job. This spreads the tiny vapor throughout the entire hangar. Because it's only a vapor, no residue is left. Even after years of use. Approved by USDA, EPA and used by food manufacturers for candy, bubble gum flavoring etc., the fluid in this product is grapeish to use and a great lite scent to smell. Unharmful to humans, animals and even the birds...birds just go away.

So, one Birdbuffer Q2 and the Hurricane II fan spread grape vapor throughout the entire hangar area, automatically, without any help.

The birds fly into the big open door and swoop around in a circle to go right back out again...never landing or staying inside after just 3 months.

Place the bird control vapor machine on the edge wall with the fan tilted up toward the roof area at the back. This will give the entire area coverage.

No need to place the unit up high where the birds are roosting. Just place the unit near the door where they come in and go out, low enough to be able to service the machine on a simple ladder. This way the birds have to fly through the vapor to get in and out of the hangar. After they do this for a few weeks, they learn this is not good and start looking for a new home.

Coming to work the next morning can be a major relief when the mess is not needing to be cleaned up. What a great way to start the day! Yeah! 😊 Relief is just a vapor away! Invisible Protection...Visible Results®
